A Full Treasury

President Wilson is by far luckier than President Cleveland was when Cleveland entered upon his second term in the Presidency. When Cleveland was elected in 1892, the finances of the country were at a low ebb. There was even talk of a bond issue for current expenses. The spirit of the Democracy at that time was exceedingly radical, and was impatient upon the point of tariff revision. There was no brake applied by President Cleveland, as President Wilson has applied the brake. President Cleveland at no time indicated that he would interpose to preserve the continuity of business and the prosperity of the internal commerce of the country. On the contrary, he joined with those who were uncompromising on the proposition that there must be a severe revision of the tariff downward, regardless of the effect of this upon industry and business. The consequence was that from the day of his election things began to go to smash, and after his inauguration the Coxey armies filled the land.

Quite different is the outlook for President Wilson. There has been no break in the business prosperity and industrial activity of the country since his election. There is no feverish demand for the enforcement of partisan ideas regardless of consequences. On the contrary, consequences have been put forward as the main proposition, and the country has been time and again assured and reassured that nothing would be done to block business activity or to head off business confidence and prosperity. So far from there being a deficit in the National finances, there is a full treasury, and the outlook is altogether secure for the administration in this respect. President Taft, as shown by Representative Payne of New York, left in the treasury on current account $149,355,711, "the largest amount ever handed over to any new administration." So that on every hand President Wilson has a rosy official future before him, if only he will act with due caution, and refer constantly to his pledges of non-interference with and protection of the business prosperity of the country.

Postmasters Scared

The thirty-five thousand postmasters whom President Taft undertook to protect in office by putting them in the civil service list, precisely as President Roosevelt had done during his term as to a very large number of postmasters, evidently see their finish. It was not thought wise to vacate President Taft's order, on account of the row that the civil service reformers would make about it; and so Postmaster General Burleson ingeniously conceived the idea that inasmuch as these postmasters were put in the civil service he would apply civil service examinations to them. The examinations so proposed will be got up by himself, and he will be inclined, of course, to see that they are so framed that the ordinary postmaster would fail to pass them.

The postmasters affected seem to understand this without any coaching, and so they are resigning, as reported, at the rate of two hundred a day. It is just as well, for it would be idle to try to hold on to their offices in view of the program that Postmaster General Burleson is said to be having prepared, for, as the purpose of the examination would inevitably be to oust the Republican postmasters, and as the examination would be fixed by Postmaster General Burleson, the fact that he would so frame it as to compel the failure of most of the postmasters was too evident for argument.

The postmasters, therefore, foreseeing their inevitable doom, get out before the examination is proposed. This is what they would have to do anyway, and it is just as well for them to go peacefully and voluntarily in any other way; since to wait and face the odium of failure to pass an examination, which failure would necessarily impute to them an unfitness to hold the office, would be distasteful in the extreme.

The ingenuity of Postmaster General Burleson's conception in this matter is worthy of the best era of "spoils politics" in the United States. He is evidently a man on to his job, and fully determined to have Democrats manage the postoffices.

Verdict by Audience

In these days of attacks upon the courts and of making a National issue of the recall of the decisions of state courts, it is curious to see the freaks that follow. Judges in California and in Oregon have been accused of pandering to popular clamor and giving decisions that are not sound in law because of supposed popular demand for such rulings.

But it has been left to Georgia to put the cap-sheaf of folly upon deference to popular judgment in the matter of court procedure. A story comes from there of the trial of a negro charged with burglary and assault with intent to commit rape. Two women of ill repute are reported as the complainants. The jury found the man guilty, as we see recited in the New York Evening Post, but recommended that instead of being punished as for a felony he be punished as for a misdemeanor. The judge seems to have been a weak-minded sort of person, and he was misled by the finding of the jury. So he put the matter to the audience in his court as to whether the jury's recommendation should be followed. The audience promptly overruled the jury, and held the prisoner to be guilty of felony, and the judge sentenced the negro accordingly. This disgusted the jury immensely, and the foreman made an affidavit that he feels sure that "the jury would have acquitted the defendant absolutely if it had believed that the court would disregard the recommendation made by the jury that the defendant be punished as for a misdemeanor."

The agitation could not be allowed to rest there, of course, and so it was taken to Governor Brown of Georgia. He promptly paroled the prisoner saying that if cases of this kind be left to a vote of the audience "we shall soon find the mob ruling in Georgia—certainly in the court rooms." Our New York contemporary suggests that the only remedy now is the recall of Governor Brown. But the whole affair seems to have been a wretched farce, in which the judge played the clown's part. If there should be any such thing as a recall of judges, that judge in Georgia is evidently the leading candidate for the first application of the recall of judges.
